A Borrowed Place The History

It is still a great place. It was barely populated when Britain took it in 1841. The Brits returned a substantial metropolis to China, roughly one and a half century later. This is a readable history of Hongkong, written in 1993 from the British perspective, before the place was handed back to China.

The common thread running throughout "A Borrowed Place" is the conflict between the traditions and customs of the Chinese and the sensitivities of the British who ran the place. From the British perspective, the governing of Hong Kong was unusually sensitive to local (read Chinese) concerns - although it was never,
