Aquinas On Friendship
Friendship According to St. Thomas Aquinas. True friendship is based on unselfish love for another person. What is meant by unselfish love is the "constant, effective desire to do good to another."¹ But although unselfish love is a basis for friendship it is not enough. There must be some common ground or area between two persons who form such a relationship.

After Schwartz introduces Aquinas's distinction between two types of union that can obtain between lover and beloved (real union and a union of affection), Schwartz ...

For the Philosopher says (Ethic. viii, 3) that "the perfect friendship is that which is on account of virtue." Now any virtue is the cause of friendship: "since the good is lovable to all," as Dionysius states (Div. Nom. iv). Therefore friendliness is not a special virtue, but a consequence of every virtue. Objection 2.

For it would be absurd to speak of having friendship for wine or for a horse. Yet neither does well-wishing suffice for friendship, for a certain mutual love is requisite, since friendship is between friend and friend: and this well-wishing is founded on some kind of communication.
