As the law currently stands, AI cannot be the inventor (and therefore the owner of a patent) because “devising” an invention is a human activity which involves contributing to the inventive concept. The invention and any patent granted over it will, as a consequence, belong either to the human deviser or, if an employee, their employer.

This is not necessarily the case, since inventors of an invention and the authors of a document can be (and often are) different. The consequences of failing to correctly identify the inventors in a patent application can be severe. If an inventor was omitted, the assignee of record may not be the sole owner of the patent rights.
