Julio Cortázar's Hopscotch (translated by Gregory Rabassa, published by Pantheon Books) takes us to Paris in the 1950s, where Argentinian flaneur Horacio Oliveira spends his days pounding the streets of the French capital and his nights either drinking and listening to jazz with his friends in the Serpent Club (a rag-tag collection of ex-pats from all over the world) or sleeping with La Maga, a Uruguyan woman the club's men all find appealing because of her intellectual naivety.

'Hopscotch' by Julio Cortázar (Review) - Tony's Reading List

Cortazar, an Argentinian who has been living in Paris since the early '50's, was introduced here last year with The Winners. Hopscotch, however, which is almost twice as long, which has no narrative action whatsoever, no characters-- only voices, very articulate voices to be sure, may prompt more irritation than admiration.
