Jung challenges the traditional Christian myth that says God sent his son to die for man's sins. He says, God realised that Job was treated unjustly, and God repents by sending his son to die for his, God's, sins. Jung argues that this serves as a metaphor for God's own psychological evolution over time.

Jung responded by trying to blackmail Freud over a possible affair with his sister-in law. All in all, this is not a pretty story. We derive much psychology from the main protagonists here, and there's a lot of bad behaviour, which as Kerr observes was detrimental to psychoanalysis. Only now are some of the unresolved issues being untangled.
