Eco says he translated 'rat' as 'topo', which in Italian actually means mouse, because. This is a subject I just find endlessly fascinating. Eco's theme in this book is that translation (particularly literary translation) is a "negotiation" between what you might call the 'letter' and the 'spirit' of the original.

The Chinese word [鼠] can refer to either rat or mouse - there are no distinctive words for them. The illustrations in the Chinese Zodiac scripts depicted a common look of the two, or some look more like rat and others more like mouse. So the English translation "Rat" or "Mouse" is fine either way as both are common unisex nouns.

Mouse Or Rat Translation As Negotiation Umberto Eco
Mouse or Rat? is an entertaining and informative look at the role of negotiation in translation, with a focus on Eco's experience with the translation of his own fiction and scholarly works. The examples Eco cites are, in some cases, mind-numbingly complex (how many times do we have to preserve subtle allusions to medieval literature in a dozen different languages?), but there is a certain clarity to be gained by looking at extremes.

Eco says he translated 'rat' as 'topo', which in Italian actually means mouse, because they don't really have a word that means 'rat' in the same sense. Of course, this misses the wordplay of 'rat' as someone who is a betrayer. The book is mainly a series of similar examples, many taken from translations of Eco's own works.
