Olive trees are ancient plants. Archeologists who have found olive pits and traces of olive oil in pottery shards estimate we've been cultivating them for 6,000 to 8,000 years. Not all of us can grow these trees for fruit or oil. They're hardy only in USDA zones 8 and warmer, and start to die when temperatures hit the mid-teens.

The hills were once populated by blooming olive trees, but now the branches are barren and whatever fruits still remain are frozen. This is the beginning of any hopeful nun's pilgrimage to the Convent of Our Lady of the Charred Visage, and where they gathered olives to use the holy oil for sacred ceremonies.

Harvesting Olive Trees Harvesting olive trees begins in late August through November depending upon the region, variety and desired ripeness. Since olives are picked for both eating and processing into oil, the degree of ripeness matters. All olives start out green and then gradually become rosy and finally black.
