The Three Cornered World Natsume

'The Three Cornered World' is a novel about being an artist. The unnamed protagonist, a painter, escapes city life for the tranquility of the countryside - the world of nature - to work. There are a number of reflections on what makes an artist: someone who strives to transcend reality in an artistic realm beyond the shackles of thought and necessity; inhabiting the art form in a trance-like oneness.

Beautifully written, humorous and filled with bitter-sweet reflections on the human condition, The Three-Cornered World was intended as a unique haiku-novel with a mood utterly different to anything ever produced in the West. Demonstrating along the way a mastery of everything from Western painting to Chinese literature, Soseki succeeded in an artistic tour-de-force that produced what legendary recording artist Glenn Gould would simply refer to as his favourite book.

There are many themes examined in The Three Cornered world, the most predominant being the interior thoughts of the painter-poet on his vision quest. Much has been written of the Japanese poets' concern with nature, but here, for all its landscapes and mountains and moons and spring airs, we see what that nature poetry is truly all about.
